B: ACADEMIC HISTORY

6. A. RESEARCH ENDEAVOURS

I study the neuroscience of the self and human emotion, with a focus on how self-perception shapes emotional responses to determine well-being. I am particularly interested in how transformational practices such as meditation, daily diaries, psychedelics, and exercise foster resilience against stress, reducing vulnerability to disorders such as depression. To this end, my work has three major streams:

- (1) The Neuroscience of Interoception. My NSERC supported work has focused on developing a neurobiological model of interoception, the representation of internal body states. As PI, I performed functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) research on interoception and the protective effects of mindfulness meditation-based interventions. There, I laid the groundwork for the proposed research by developing a functional neuroscience of interoception, identifying functionally and cytoarchitectonically-defined boundaries within the insula, the key region of interest in interoceptive processing.

- (2) The Mechanisms of Contemplative Training. My SSHRC supported applied psychology work has focused on understanding the neural and cognitive mechanisms underlying mindfulness training and related contemplative approaches, including yoga, breathwork, self-care reflection, journaling, stress mindset training. This work has explored manualized mindfulness interventions such as Mindfulness-Based Stress Reduction and Mindfulness-Based Cognitive therapy, producing some of the initial neural systems accounts of mindfulness as an expansion of the self to include momentary, viscerosomatic representations of the embodied self, accounts that have now been well-replicated and acknowledged globally. My work has also focused on identifying the key psychological mechanisms supporting the benefits of mindfulness and related practices, leading to co-authorship of Mindfulness-to-Meaning theory, which has recently been expanded to introduce the concept of Sense Foraging as a way by which to introduce flexibility into cognition and appraisal more broadly than formal meditation practice. I continue to work to develop accessible, scalable, and enjoyable interventions to assess and improve wellbeing, with a recent focus on post-secondary student populations, including entering the third year of our UTMAP.org project to map out and communicate data about on-campus wellbeing.
- (3) Clinical Models of Depression Vulnerability and Resilience. My CIHR supported work is supported by rich clinical collaborations to explore the risk and resilience factors around Major Depressive Disorder, leading to world's largest prospective clinical trial of depression vulnerability amidst a population of participants with recurrent depression. With data collection on the trial now complete, my work focuses on revealing the neural mechanisms of depression prophylaxis, including the surprising finding that enhancing sensory engagement may be more effective than a focus on remediating negative self-beliefs. I also led Canada's first clinical trial of psychedelic microdosing for depression, working with Health Canada to establish initial safety protocols and explore the efficacy of microdosing psilocybin relative to placebo. The trial is now complete, with important insights that will inform safety guidelines in Canada, and emphasize the importance of set and setting in psychedelic research.
